This audio cassette of two complete original broadcast of "The New Adventures of Sherlock Homes" will transport you back to 1945. Turn you dial to the Mutual broadcast network on your mental radio and relive the actual broadcast of two shows. Included are announcer introductions, commercials and at the conclusion an appeal to support the war effort by buying bonds. The announcer states that the broadcast is being sent out on the Armed Forces Network. The audio quality is excellent - no hiss, snaps or pops. These recordings must be from master tapes not a re-record of a broadcast. As an added bonus the principles are Basil Rathbone and Nigel Bruce who many consider the best Holmes and Watson combo. For those of us that just missed the Golden Age of radio dramas this tape will provided an excellent and entertaining introduction.<sup>2</sup> of 2 people found the following review helpful. The Best of Holmes -- The Worst of HolmesBy George R Dekle "The Unfortunate Tobacconist" showcases how well Anthony Boucher and Dennis Green can craft a Holmes mystery. The plot is well-constructed, the characters engaging, and Holmes is refreshingly humble. The story's only real flaw is that it suffers from a somewhat obvious solution--a shortcoming of many of the Boucher-Green collaborations. "The Paradol Chamber" on the other hand is as contrived and silly a piece of work as one could hope to imagine. In Boucher's and Green's defense, you must admit that Conan Doyle, who only wrote 56 Holmes stories, wrote several stinkers himself. Boucher and Green cranked out over 200 stories, and they did it on a much tighter schedule than Conan Doyle worked against. Regardless of the poor quality of "The Paradol Chamber," the chemistry between Bruce and Rathbone is perfect, and they never fail to entertain.

These original radio broadcasts from the 1940s bring back memories for nostalgia buffs and introduce the popular British sleuth Sherlock Holmes and his sidekick Dr. Watson to a new generation of listeners.
